Conversation Guide for the video: Changing How We Talk About Disabilities

Building a Shared Understanding

This video addresses the importance of using respectful and positive language when talking about students with disabilities.

Key Understandings

- Words can shape our ideas, perceptions and attitudes about ourselves and others.
- When we see a diagnosis or disability as the defining characteristic of an individual student, we devalue that person as an individual.
- Using language that puts people first (such as ‘a student with a disability’ rather than ‘a disabled student’) acknowledges that individuals with disabilities are first and foremost people.
- When discussing specialized supports and services, it may be more helpful to describe what the student needs (based on their strengths, challenges, interests and experiences) instead of focusing on their disability.

Questions for Discussion

- What was your reaction to the statement “just like gender, ethnicity, and other traits, a disability is simply one of the many natural parts of being human”?
- Thinking about your own experiences, can you recall a time when the use of language about students with disabilities created inadvertent barriers?
- How would you respond to individuals who use stereotypical references such as ‘those behaviour kids’ in conversations about students with disabilities?
- How could the information in this video be helpful to your work in the future?

Taking the Pulse at the School and Authority Level

- Do programming and services for students with disabilities in your school authority model respectful and positive language?
